

Ahmed, Notice here that anything said about Nature, or the experiment, applies exactly to human nature: no distinction can be made.

Notes on ES self-control, relevant to the human condition.

see orientation of the 90° Spiral: the hurricane, vs self-control by nature.

In the natural ES process, spin preserves the axis, attraction preserves the spin. Surroundings then determine evolution of the reaction just as much as inside form. (This is true of any storm, certainly human behavior.) For the artificial apparatus then, a large outer shell may be required to tame the reaction, just as the electron regulates and tames the proton. The feedback would preserve natural self-control, according to vector openings. (- creative outlets; frustration leads to violence.)

As for the inner process, the hardened shell prevents scale reduction. (- the normal response to increasing tension and acceleration.) Properly designed (to preserve the essential motion-form) the result of motion within the shell is then: tension, relieved by acceleration, which increases tension, which increases acceleration, etc. There is no theoretical limit to the increasing acceleration. The process is naturally form-perfecting, and self-purging of internal chaos as rate increases. To prevent form perfection, introduction of internal chaos is required, and is fundamental to the process control. Chaos allows the process to accelerate. Chaos also regulates and limits the storm's potential. Chaos is both the life and the death of the process, hence the essential "balancing act." (This is why our judgemental logic has defeated any understanding of nature's ongoing and perpetual motion, and many other things --)

Once achieved, evolution of the acceleration effect will far exceed any human reflex to control it, even if the way is known. The control must be built into the apparatus form before the process begins.

That statement takes on far more importance applied to the prediction that the human reaction to ES will take the hurricane form, with a growing effect wholly beyond any human ability to control, even if the way is known. (which is certainly not by law. It is by recognizing the central problem and dealing with it.) If there is no way for others to see that we are trained to make inverse sense, the result will be catastrophic. The only effective control lies in the saving hemisphere, at present beyond any understanding.

I have raised this issue since the beginning. There has been no understanding, hence no reaction. If there is no preparation, and no way to control the reaction. The global storm of self-destruction will simply accelerate, fed by a growing chaos of euphoria and fear-reactions. Free energy would rip the present system to shreds.

If there is any truth in these words it is ample reason for my present paralysis. All words have proved futile. I am left only the proof of it all, to communicate.

They will be done.
